Abstract The purpose of this study was to examine the effects of a 12-week, 3-day-per-week, 100-min-per-session, low-impact aerobically demanding dance program on the physical fitness and health-related quality of life (HRQL) of sedentary, middle-aged women. The program was designed to be enjoyable and to include a variety of dance styles, including ballroom, Latin, and contemporary. The program was evaluated using a pretest-posttest design. The study included 20 women who were sedentary and had no history of cardiovascular disease, diabetes, or other chronic conditions. The women were divided into two groups: a control group and an intervention group. The control group continued with their sedentary lifestyle, while the intervention group participated in the dance program. The study measured physical fitness (cardiorespiratory fitness, muscular strength, and flexibility) and HRQL (physical and mental health, social functioning, and overall quality of life) at baseline and at 12 weeks. The results showed that the intervention group had significant improvements in cardiorespiratory fitness, muscular strength, and flexibility compared to the control group. Additionally, the intervention group had significant improvements in physical and mental health, social functioning, and overall quality of life compared to the control group. The findings suggest that a low-impact aerobically demanding dance program can be an effective intervention for improving physical fitness and HRQL in sedentary, middle-aged women.

Book Content

It is the first book about energy saving and consumption-reduction principles in heat pumps. It is closely in line with modern environmental protection concept and discusses the energy-saving principle of heat pumps in a simple language, so it is of great significance. The heat pump is a kind of heating device converting a large amount of useful low-temperature heat energy into useful high-temperature heat energy on the cost of a small amount of electric or fuel energy, which is similar a pump which pumps water heat energy. Drying industry consumes much energy, in which heat pump technology is gradually applied. During evaporation, heat pumps may save energy and work more effectively especially in MVR heat pump evaporation.

Figure 1. The effect of the number of trials on the number of correct responses. The number of correct responses was significantly higher for the 10-trial condition than for the 5-trial condition.

The book is completed by the teaching sequence in practice, intended to help the teacher/knowledge engineer to put the method into application. Starting with design issues to assist students to learn historical tool features and component's relationships with theory, before modeling cases and to use them with practical applications. The computerization of theoretical teaching and example analysis is conducted to the memory and understanding of learners who operates tool features and component aspects knowledge.
